

WHERE DID HEATH'S CAPITAL GO?
An Imaginative Story of a Conference Between Heath, Gould, and Comstock.

The interest in the failures of Henry N. Smith and William Heath & Co. was shown yesterday chiefly by the question which every one asked: "What has become of Heath's capital?" There were no developments or explanations obtainable changing the figures given in The Sun on Sunday, which showed that the amount due Heath & Co. to their customers, the amount paid out for Smith, and the amount due from Smith were very nearly the same. The schedules of the two assigns will probably not be filed for some time.

A full account was published yesterday a circumstantial and detailed account of a protracted conference between Jay Gould, Adlison, Cannonback, and William Heath, at the office of the latter at 205 Grand St. It was aversed, negotiations for putting Heath & Co. on their feet were still continuing, and it was reported that the amount of time attended any such conference, he spent most of the day in a trip of inspection of the property of the firm, and that he had been to the road. Mr. Heath was surprised at the story, and told his friends that it was made out of whole cloth.

"I am sure," he said, "that they will make the point in their efforts to collect their claim against us. I have no doubt that they signed the release to Worcester over the joint account transactions, and therefore had no right to give it."

Miss Crane Purases her Purse and Recovers It.

Eleanore Crans, a pretty stenographer, 22 years old, who lives near Washawken, and has been visiting a friend at Elizabethtown street, took a walk through the park yesterday evening. Near Bank street a shabbily dressed man walked up to her with a paper in hand and stopped her.

"Lady," he said, "will you kindly tell me where this purse is?"

Miss Crans took the paper to look at it, and dangled her purse containing $17.00 at the little finger of her left hand. The man snatched it, and ran off with it.

Miss Crans chased him until she ran against a policeman. He got her purse back. George Westerlow, the policeman, was comitted.
